There is a bright and dark side to beekeeping. A great deal depends on the locality. Where white clover does not exist extensively bee-keeping would be a hazardous business, and even in the best blocalities it is not a business that any person can depend on to make a living.

One may succeed, and he may not. He may prosper for some years, obtain a large number of families of bees, and a very severe winter may destroy nearly all of them. Even warmly-built winter bee-houses are not safe in very cold winters.

Now, suppose that we, in imagination, call on one hundred men who have been or now are keeping bees in movable comb hives in a good locality for beesmen who keep from five to fifty families. We find that ten of them have lost all their bees, and have given up the business in disgust. Twenty have fewer families now than they had five years ago. "Oh, sir, our cold winters."

"Have you made money by bee-keeping?"

"Some seasons we make a little, and in other seasons nothing. Mr. — and Mr. — are very successful. They had about a thousand pounds each of our honey last season, each having about fifty families."

We will now call on Mr. —, who has six hundred families.

"I have eight; keep a man to attend to each in swarming time."

"Do your bees increase much?"

"I get a good many swarms some seasons, but I don't increase my stock, taking out winter losses. In fact, to tell the truth, I had more bees five years are they lave and medium. I have now."
